MR. BEECHER'S STATEMENT.

Pausing in the progress of the developderful paper. A chapter from personal life history—what we are accustomed to look upon as the prosaic matter-of-fact history of the every-day life of this modern nineteenth century—it surpasses in interest, dramatic incident, plot and counter-plot, anything which the most imaginative or sensational novelist has for a quarter of a century dared to present to the public as probable or possible. In one way or another every passion of human nature enters into it. Ambition, love, vanity, envy, hatred, with despair, malice, treachery and falsehood, all go to fill up the tableau which is presented to us. In addition to the four principal characters, standing out the hold unpleasant light upon. fill up the tablesu which is presented to us. In addition to the four principal characters, standing out in bold, unpleasant light upon the canvass, we have a throng of minor persons and a combination of lesser interests crowding the scene. Look at the picture. The most famous prescher of his country, a distinguished editor, artists and lawyers, a weak woman, and two or three bold, bad ones, little children, some living, some dead; gray-haired men and women of another generation, who wish they had not lived to see so great a woe; a rich and power of the blacks of Mississippl by the whites. Intimitation, shrouding in its poisonous mists what we have so long looked upon as good and pure and sanctified. The whole sub-tori is sickaning to aven the lowest type of and present and provided in the size of the prolonged bloodshed and insist on a conference with the great Powers of Europe for a high count or an international council of arbitration. From North began to tell upon its weakened opponent. written but Mr. Beecher himself. From the first sentence to the last it is Beecher. and Beecher alone, in conception, thought, the National Military School at West Point was expression, style, except possibly in those established by its founders. The principal moral angry sentences wherein he brands Tilton larly-trained officers are enormously superior and Tilton's friends and associates with when nations take up arms, to civilians, or, as fraud and faisehood and crime; for it is not they are scornfully called in the United Stasts the nature of Beecher to wound and destroy with his eloquence, but rather to admorbsh and lead up to what is beautiful and good. However men may differ from him, however they may condomn his latitudinarianism in spiritual things, there can be no doubt that the world is better that he has lived, and that his broad and catholic spirit has had an influence only for good upon his generation. His defence is studded with the most caquisite passages, which more than sustains the great reputation he has made, and which, if he had written nothing else, would prove him to be a man of rare and splendid genius. It is not presented, perhaps, with the force and viger in which Tilton couched the assault upon him, but in its simplicity and carnestness it irresistibly carries with it the conviction that he has spoken the truth. For nearly six years he was evidently the centre of a conspiracy. In that conspiracy was primarily this man Tilton—the man whom he first met as a reporter of his sermons, young, onthusiastic, whom Beecher in the fullness of his fame, with a reputation that extended over two hemispheres, took by the hand and led up step by step, until he placed him in the "proudest editorial chair in America," second only to himself in honor and influence in the opinion of thousands and thousands of his countrymen. Tilton was barely twenty-two when he was made, through Beecher's influence, the editor of his fame, with a reputation that extended over two hemispheres, took by the hand and led up step by step, until he placed him in the "proudest editorial chair in America," second only to himself in honor and influence in the opinion of thousands and thousands of his countrymen.
